LOCAL CIVIL WAR CENTENNIAL COMMITTEES

Richmond, Va.- Local Civil War Centennial committees, appointed by county boards of supervisors or city councils throughout Virginia, were defined today as being "agencies" of the respective local governments.

In a bulletin to local committees, the Virginia Civil War Commission asked them to recommend to their governing bodies plans for carrying out the purposes for which the committees were set up and, then, to execute plans that are approved.

The relationship between governing body and Centennial committee connotes obligations on both sides, the Commission said.

"The committee is encouraged to keep the governing body advised as to its plans and program, the governing body will want to support the Centennial committee it created," said James J. Geary, Executive Director.

As public agencies, the committees may accept donations. In this connection, Geary reminded the committees that contributions made to them for Centennial purposes were deductible from both federal and state income taxes. Expenses of committee members, not reimbursed by the county or city, are deductible from federal income tax.

Geary emphasized the importance of the local committees, saying that Virginia's Civil War Centennial was intended to be primarily a local one.
